The United States still remains the sole superpower but with the rise of "the rest," particularly China, the present structure of the world order will eventually be reconfigured. In reality, China is not rising but as Aaron Friedberg states, "it is returning to the position of regional preeminence that it once held." Indeed, China dominated that region for centuries. However, before China can become a legitimate superpower, it must meet its internal and external challenges and make some fundamental political changes. China's nine percent economic growth rate since 1990 has enabled it to expand its sphere of influence and gain ground not only in Asia but also in Africa and South America. This influence will probably continue to grow in the future. As a European leader once remarked, Europe should be a superpower, not a superstate. Faced with an increasingly powerful and authoritarian China, global heating, the challenge of AI, not to mention an aggressive Russia, chaotic Middle East and Trumpian United States, this argument is more compelling than ever. In a world of giants, you need to be a giant yourself. But is Europe up to the job? The answer is not a simple yes or no. And it has no place for European states that are either not, not yet or, in the singular case of Britain, no longer members of the European Union. In case you hadn't clicked already, the European leader who coined the "superpower, not a superstate" formula was a British prime minister, Tony Blair, speaking in Warsaw in 2000. By the time the US stops being a superpower, the word "superpower" will be an anachronism due to either the rise of the super-nation (regional nations of nations or a global government) or because technology makes them obsolete. 20.5k views · View 149 Upvoters. Its geography is enviable: the United States is really the only major power that can host a two-ocean navy, with its sizable Atlantic and Pacific coastlines enabling it to project power. The United States has a younger population than Japan or Europe, and China's population is aging faster than America's. China is the most complex. It faces enormous challenges as well as enormous opportunities. It has a large population and its economy is still growing at quite a rapid rate.
