Your credit history plays a major role in getting new credit cards or loans at a good interest rate. Learn what makes up your credit history. Your credit history is a record of the credit accounts you've held along with details about those accounts including: the type of account, your responsibility on the account (e.g. whether you were a joint borrower), the credit limit or amount of the loan, the current balance, minimum payment, whether you've been late in the past seven years, and the current account status. In your credit history, you'll find the names of businesses who've recently requested your credit file, for example, because you've applied for credit or because they want to market a product or service to you.
